Forward

To talk about Abelardo Morell's influence on photography and as an instructor would almost certainly sound, at first, like flattery. So, I'll start a little more personally. I first saw Abe's photographs before I knew I would be a photographer. I saw them in a book, in the hands of my undergraduate photography instructor, as he told us about the first time he saw them. My instructor, Joe, had been Abe's assistant after working with him as a MassArt graduate student. Even such a close connection felt like photographic lore to me. I could not have predicted how important Abe's pictures and teaching would be to me in later years.

Abe is in love with photography, and art in general. It's the kind of love he has to talk about and share, which is why he was and is such an excellent teacher. He understands that sharing photography is the thing that keeps it so fresh, beautiful, and influential. It is the thing that keeps him compassionate and humble. It is the thing that helped him examine leaving Cuba, the 1960's in the United States, and moments as intimate as early fatherhood. He is willing to repeatedly share his mind and his experiences with us as an audience, and we are all richer for it.
